INAUGURATION FOR SECOND TERM OF PRESIDENT WOODROW WILSON

By Associated Press. WASHINGTON, D. C., Mar. 5.—President Wilson and Vice-President Marshall were inaugurated for their second term today with a great patriotic demonstration of Americanism.

The solemn dignity of the ceremonies of inaugurating the vice-president in the senate chamber and the simple but impressive ceremony in the open air on the plaza before the capitol when the president delivered his inaugural address, were accentuated by the note of patriotic fervor which predominated through all the proceedings of the day.

First Democratic president to succeed himself since Jackson and tenth to be re-elected, President Wilson entered his second term of office with a new consecration to the service of his country.

It was the president's wish that his inauguration should be a simple one, and all through the fixed program which covered more than five hours, while there was the pomp, ceremony and spectacular display which inevitably attaches to the inauguration of a president, the studied effort was to keep the ceremonies in accord with the best traditions of America—ceremonies which in the main were planned by George Washington more than a century ago.

The event was simplified because there was no dual ceremony to attend the departure of an outgoing president, and further simplified because it did not fall in with the rush and confusion of the dying hours of Congress.

The ceremony began with the president's departure from the White House for the capitol. That was fixed by program for 11 o'clock. Just before that time the escorts for the party began assembling, a squadron of the Second United States cavalry for the president, and the black horse troop of Culver Military Academy for the vice-president. Just before the hour of departure, the Congressional committee in charge of the inauguration arrangements arrived.

Through the gates of the White House grounds to Pennsylvania avenue, the marching ground of inaugural armies of war and peace gone long before, the official party headed toward the capitol.

Steel cables strung along the line of march held a multitude from crowding into the avenue. Reviewing stands were well filled for the wait of some two hours before the presidential party would return at the end of the inaugural procession.

When the official party arrived at the capitol, the president, with Mrs. Wilson went to the president's room near the senate chamber and the vice-president and Mrs. Marshall went to the vice-president's room to await the beginning of the ceremonies in the senate chamber.

Galleries had been filling long before this hour. Invited guests of the president, vice-president, speaker and justices of the supreme court of the United States, supplied with coveted cards of admission, were assigned to the east side. The gallery ordinarily reserved for the diplomatic corps was given over to members of their families as the diplomats themselves were assigned to places on the floor. Guests of senators were assigned to the northeast gallery and guests of representatives had seats in the three west ones.

A flood of light, softened by the tinted glasses in the lofty ceiling, was diffused throughout the beautiful auditorium, which has few rivals among the assembly chambers of the world's parliaments and illuminated the dignified, impressive, even dramatic, and yet simple, ceremony about to be enacted on the floor.

While the senate was assembling for its special session, the first of the 65th Congress, the diplomatic corps was arriving and assembling in the marble room, to be escorted into the chamber. Gorgous in the colors and gold of their court uniforms, the corps entered headed by its dean, the ambassador of France, Jules J. Jusserand. One figure which had been familiar at other inaugural ceremonies was missing. It was that of the German ambassador, Count Johann H. von Bernstorff, with whose country the United States has severed diplomatic relations. The other diplomats entered by precedence in order of the time they have been accredited to this country, the ambassadors coming first and the ministers last. They were shown to seats reserved for them near the center aisle and immediately behind the space reserved for the president's cabinet.

Then came the chief justice and the associate justices of the supreme court, in the sombre black silk gowns of office, moving in a body with slow dignity to the places reserved for them in large chairs placed in the front row facing the vice-president and at his right.

Immediately afterward, the retiring members of the house of representatives and the members elect, were announced. They had been forming meanwhile in two lines down the long corridor reaching toward the house wing of the capitol. The house, unlike the senate, was not in session. Some retiring members had departed for their homes without waiting for the ceremonies. A smaller attendance of representatives than usual, however, made for the comfort of those in the small senate chamber.

A seat had been placed on the rostrum for Speaker Clark at the left of Senators Saulsbury, president pro tempore of the senate. The representatives and former representatives filled through the chamber to places reserved for them on the west side of the chamber, while the senators were seated on the east. A few other places were set apart on the floor for high officers of the army and navy and persons who by name have received the thanks of Congress. With so much of the party assembled, everything was in readiness for the first ceremony, the inauguration of the vice-president.

President Wilson, escorted by the committee on arrangements, entered the senate chamber at the main door and was escorted to a seat on the floor, on the right hand side of the main aisle and facing the rostrum. Vice-president Marshall was escorted to a seat on the rostrum.

From that stage the ceremonies moved along rapidly. The senate chaplain, the Rev. J. Forrest Prettyman, offered prayer and the senate of the 65th Congress was called to order by the president pro tempore, Senator Saulsbury.

As silence settled over the chamber, Vice-President Marshall stood beside Senator Saulsbury. Both men raised their right hands; the president pro tempore slowly spoke the vice-president's oaths, the vice-president repeated the words. Brief and simple, the ceremony quickly was over and the 32 new senators were sworn into office.

As the inaugural party passed out from the great dome and into the open air to the spot where practically all presidents since Monroe have been inaugurated, it was as if the curtain had been raised for the climax of the drama.

Before a great sea of humanity, official and unofficial, invited and uninvited, President Wilson took his place at the left of the chief justice and at the right of the arrangements committee.

While the party was assembling the units of the inaugural procession were forming on all sides of the capitol, and the music of marching bands as the organizations took place waiting to swing into line behind the president when he started back to the White House, gave the only appearance of a military air in the whole proceeding.

The assembling of the Presidential party, its departure and the demonstrations of the crowd were the only spectacular features of the outdoor ceremony. The actual ceremony itself is simplicity and solemnity.

When the president takes the inaugural oath, the chief justice, bible in hand, steps forward; the man who is about to take office stands beside him with raised hand. Slowly and solemnly the chief justice repeats the oath prescribed by the constitution:

"I do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of president of the United States, and will to the best of my ability preserve, protect and defend the constitution of the United States."

When that was concluded, the senate returned to its chamber, and the president returned to the White House at the head of his inaugural procession. Mrs. Wilson, following a precedent set by Mrs. Taft, rode with her husband, after having created a precedent herself by riding to the capitol with him earlier in the day.

As the president led the procession up Pennsylvania avenue and the units of the inaugural parade, civic and military, swung in behind him, a demonstration began which continued until the procession halted in front of the White House. There the president and his party took places in the official stand to view the remainder of the column.
